FRAND issues under consultation from different policy perspectives

Standardisation of technology generally requires holders of Standard Essential Patents ("SEPs") to commit to granting licences for the use of their patents as part of the standard on Fair Reasonable and Non-Discriminatory ("FRAND") conditions. Refusal by an SEP holder to grant a licence for use of standard patented technology to a competitor willing to accept a licence on FRAND terms may constitute an abuse of dominance under Article 102 TFEU.

This article discusses a number of recent consultations in which the European Commission considers FRAND issues from different policy perspectives. First, DG GROW is consulting on the development of a fair and balanced licensing framework for SEPs. In parallel, DG COMP address the application of competition rules to standardisation agreements, of which patented technology and FRAND licensing can be part, in its drafts of the revised horizontal block exemption regulations (HBERs) and guidelines on horizontal cooperation (Horizontal Guidelines). A third interesting development in relation to FRAND licensing is the Commission's proposal for the Data Act, in which FRAND principles are proposed to be applied to data access.
